There are different opinions about whether smartphones should be allowed in university classrooms. The bar chart shows that students use smartphones for different learning purposes, such as looking up new words or information, taking photos of the board, and using study apps. This suggests that students mainly want to use smartphones as useful tools to help with their learning.

In contrast, the pie chart shows that teachers are mostly concerned about the negative effects of smartphones. They worry that smartphones may distract students, lead to cheating, reduce face-to-face interaction, or be difficult to manage. I think these concerns may be a little too negative.

In my opinion, smartphones should be allowed in classrooms. However, students should learn how to use them properly for learning. This way, students can benefit from smartphones while teachers can feel more comfortable allowing them in class.
